Universities have launched schemes to attract hundreds of ethnic minority students into research.

The initiatives follow claims of institutional racism in academia, particularly affecting black people.

One analysis shows that out of nearly 20,000 PhD positions awarded over three years, 245 were to black students.

The head of the UK research funding body said she was "frustrated" that the skills of so many talented people were going to waste.

Jason Arday has recently been made a professor. As a young black academic, Prof Arday, currently at Durham, seems to be having a successful university career, but he says it has come at a cost.

"If someone asked me what the blueprint is to become an academic, I'd have to say that if you are black or Asian it is 'how much can you suffer?', whereas if you are white there is actually a blueprint about getting into academia because if you are a person of colour the goalposts move all the time," he said.

Prof Dame Ottoline Leyser, chief executive of UK Research and Innovation (UKRI) said diversity will be essential if researchers are to tackle some of the world's most pressing problems.

"As we have seen with the climate change summit in Glasgow, there are going to be huge challenges facing the world. And to solve these problems, you need different people with different ways of thinking and from different backgrounds," she said.
